FROM THE COUNTRY STORE

Dear Mister Editor:

Zeke Grubb told the fellers at the country store Saturday night that his heart goes out to Alaskans because he feels like a beached whale himself. Zeke had saw where the Federal Aviation Administration thinks folks up there are heavier than the rest of us, on average. The FAA, Zeke said, probable is right.

Zeke said the FAA has ask commuter airlines in Alaska to weigh their passengers for a test period. The idea is to see if the 165-pound national average for figuring airplane loads is low. The FAA weighed survivors and victims of a recent crash of a commuter plane and found their average weight was 190.

With all the heavy eating and hibernating he done through the holidays, Zeke said, he would hate to step on scales, much less a airplane full of other fat folks. Between Thanksgiving and New Year's ever year, Zeke said he puts on layers of blubber to warm him through the dead of winter. And if he does it on sweets he has to turn into fat, Zeke said you don't have to ask what happens to folks that take their blubber straight.

Serious-speaking, Zeke went on, he knows that Alaskans eat pritty much what we eat, only more of it. They got longer nights for sleeping and eating and shorter days for working it off. Then, to, they travel different. For them, taking the airplane is like taking the bus to us, it's the only way to go. They fly to town to shop and they got to go back with what they bought, Zeke went on, and they wear more clothes that weight more.

General, the fellers showed interest in Zeke's report. Bug Hookum allowed the weigh-in is overdue for all of us. He was of a mind that the Alaska test will go national and prove what air travelers have been complaining about. They got a lot of backside and knees left over at the end of their seat and leg room. Airlines haul big people in little seats because more seats mean more people, Bug said, so they might counter the FAA study with a offer to fly folks so much a pound.

For sure, Clem Webster allowed, the old truth still holds, and for ever action there is a reaction. You know the airlines are going to buck anything that cuts their payroll, the way folks that pay the minimum wage are agin hiking it. The airlines say if they lose seats they'll have to raise rates and price people out of their service. The truck farmer says fellers on the corner waiting for work would rather have $3.30 than nothing. Besides, if his labor costs go up his vegetables go up and folks kind of economic logic, Clem said, unless you're a 200 pounder stuffed in one of them canvas harnesses on a 16-passenger commuter, or a $3.30 a hour stoop laborer with a sick baby and a broke down truck.

Clem's talk got Ed Doolittle's dander up. Ed said he allus liked the saying about the least Government being the best Government, and the Clem was as far off base as usual with his talk about righting ever wrong with a Guvernment regulation. Ed said the free enterprise system has built-in correction if it is allowed to be free, and the plain truth is that some folks that need to work and want to work ain't worth what they're paid, just as some ain't paid what they're worth.

Personal, I took a pass on the discussion.

Yours truly,
Uncle Dan
